Clean Office and Employee Productivity

What relationship exists between a clean office and employee productivity?

It stands to reason that if your employees are happy and content, they will be more productive. In addition, sick days and employee absences for illness and doctor visits directly impact productivity as well – if an employee is home sick or out seeing the doctor, they are not able to work at all. So there is a direct correlation between a clean office and employee productivity. Keeping a clean office has a number of different benefits for your business that will directly result in happier, more productive employees over the long run.

So there is a direct correlation between a clean office and employee productivity. Keeping a clean office has a number of different benefits for your business that will directly result in happier, more productive employees over the long run.

One major benefit of a clean office is that there will be less employees calling in sick or having to visit the doctor. By keeping office spaces clean and tidy and keeping germs and bacteria away, you will directly contribute to the health of your employees, and in turn, you will see more productivity as they are sick less and absent less than employees in an office which is not similarly maintained or cared for. Bacteria and germs can grow almost anywhere, so by cleaning regularly and thoroughly you can reduce the spread and development of office illnesses.

Another benefit of a clean office is that employees will be more likely to want to come to work and perform their jobs during the day. An office that is dirty, poorly lit, and with lots of junk like old computers, papers, and overflowing trash cans and other eyesores is going to be more distracting and less inviting than an office which is clean and ready for business at the beginning of each day. By removing these items and making sure that the space stays clean and inviting, you will have happier employees who are more likely to want to come to work and put in a productive day.

One final benefit of a clean office to employee productivity is that there will be less time lost, and hence less productivity lost, due to clutter. By keeping office spaces clean and organized, you will directly contribute to employee productivity because no one will have to wonder where that important document went, or what pile of other junk or trash it might be under. Keeping things clean, and keeping a clean office, is the best and least expensive method to boost employee productivity for a small amount of money and in a short period of time.
